About the Seminar

In recent years, Kerala has undergone a notable shift in the landscape of crime. While political offenses have decreased significantly, there has been a troubling rise in violence and deviance within families and communities. This change highlights a deeper transformation in the motivation and intention behind criminal behavior. What used to be rare instances of crime and death have now woven themselves into the fabric of daily life, prompting urgent discussions about psychological, cultural, and structural factors that contribute to these acts.

The heartbreaking case of Ashfaq Alam, a young man who tragically took the lives of his family, sparked widespread conversations across Kerala about the true nature of crime. It is not just about breaking the law, it is about the evolving social dynamics, emotional breakdown, and moral dilemmas that underpin these actions.

According to the National Crime Records Bureau (NCRB), Kerala has now become one of the states with the highest crime rates. Yet, these statistics don't fully reflect the intricate social realities and changing motivations that characterize today's crime landscape.

This seminar aims to go beyond mere numbers, inviting scholars, researchers, and practitioners to share their original insights on the evolving motivations, agency, and socio-cultural contexts of crime in Kerala. Through interdisciplinary discussions, we hope to redefine what "crime" means in a society that is rapidly changing and to explore how individual choices, societal pressures, and systemic influences come together in acts of violence and deviance.
